'07 CDH Enrollment Up 52% Among Non-Blues MCOs; HSA Plans Gain More Ground on HRAs

Enrollment in consumer-directed health (CDH) plans — among non-Blues health plans — grew by more than 50% over the past year, according to the latest data compiled by ICDC.

Between January 2006 and January 2007, enrollment in account-based health coverage increased by at least 1.52 million lives among the 29 non-Blues health plans that regularly furnish enrollment figures to ICDC (see table, p. 4). Collectively, those firms said 4.7 million of their members were covered by either a health reimbursement arrangement (HRA)-based plan (2.5 million) or a health savings account (HSA)-qualified plan (2.2 million). Editor's note: Complete enrollment data from the nation's Blues plans will appear in the Feb. 23 issue of ICDC. As of July 2006, the nation's Blues plans collectively had about 2 million CDH enrollees. ICDC expects January enrollment among Blues plans will near the 3 million mark.

UnitedHealth Group continues to lead the pack with more than 2.14 million covered lives in its account-based plans. As of Jan. 1, the insurer says, 1.14 million lives were covered by an HRA-based plan — up from 846,000 a year ago. Enrollment in its HSA-qualified plans grew more quickly, from 655,000 lives in January 2006 to more than 1 million this year. United's dominance in the CDH space is due in part to key acquisitions of leading CDH firms. Definity Health (acquired in December 2004) was the nation's leading provider of HRA-based plans, and Golden Rule (acquired in September 2003) was a top seller of Archer medical savings accounts (MSAs) — the predecessor of HSAs. PacifiCare Health Systems, Inc., which United acquired in late 2005, had about 90,000 CDH lives prior to the acquisition. United, however, says just 370,000

Union Employees Roll Over $1,105 From '06, Begin Third Year With Full-Replacement HDHP

Since the idea of account-based health coverage began to gain traction five years ago, organized labor officials generally have decried the strategy as simple cost shifting that favors the healthy and wealthy (ICDC 5/12/06, p. 1). A handful of small unionized employers (340 employees total) in California, however, might be able to convince them otherwise.

On Jan. 1, 2007, the four small-to mid-sized California employers began their third year with a full-replacement health savings account (HSA)-based plan. Several more employers have since joined them. The health coverage is offered through the Northern California General Teamsters Security Fund (NCGTSF) — a self-funded trust comprised of more than 260 employers and about 13,000 employees. The union group is one of the largest Taft-Hartley health funds in California.

"As far as I know, this was the first [HSA-based plan] in the country offered by a multi-employer union trust fund", says Leslie Hirschfield, vice president of consumer and corporate services at Delta Health Systems, a third-party administrator based in Stockton, Calif. On Jan. 1, 2005, NCGTSF became Delta's first client to offer HSA-based health plans.

In 2004, before looking into CDH strategies, several employers in the trust thought they would have to choose between health coverage and wage increases. The following January, a municipality and three manufacturing companies replaced their more traditional health coverage with an HSA-based PPO. In February of that year, a small rural hospital joined them, and four more employer groups joined in 2006. Enrollment in the HSA-based plans now stands at 600.

According to the rules established by NCGTSF, employers that negotiate their way into the high-deductible health plan (HDHP) must also agree to make an HSA contribution equal to at least half of the annual deductible. At the end of the first year, 40% of the money employers had contributed rolled over. Enrolled employees ended 2006 with an average HSA balance of $1,105 — up from $440 at the end of 2005, says Cora Tellez, president of Sterling HSA, an Oakland, Calif.-based firm that administers the accounts.

The cost of the HDHP is about $200 per employee per month (PEPM) less than the trust's most popular PPO option. Prior to launching the HSA-based plans, some employees were required to contribute between $200 and $300 a month toward their health care premiums. In most cases, the cost savings associated with the HDHPs meant employees were no longer asked to contribute to their premiums. They were, however, encouraged to take what they had previously paid in premiums and contribute it to an HSA, says Dave Hawley, secretary-treasurer of Teamsters Local 137.

"People don't come to me and say 'I want one of those plans because I want an HSA,'" he says. "They're saying 'I want to go to that plan because [the employer] is taking $300 a month out of my pocket.'"

Employers Use Novel HSA Funding

Rather than divvy up the annual HSA contribution into 12 monthly installments, one employer agreed to "frontload" the annual HSA contribution (50% of the deductible) on Jan. 1 so that enrollees had funds to cover expenses that came up early in the year, Hirschfield says. That employer also fronted its employees additional HSA dollars to cover the other 50% of the deductible. One-twelfth of that loan is then automatically deducted from employee paychecks (pretax) each month and paid back to the employer. Employees agree to repay a prorated portion of that loan if they terminate employment before the end of the year, Hawley explains. "The biggest complaint I heard is that there is no money in the HSA on Jan. 1. So if there's a significant expense early in the year, they can't use the HSA to pay for it," he says.

For the other employers, Hawley says a local credit union agreed to provide HDHP enrollees with a line of credit at the beginning of the year that would work as a safety net as enrollees built up their HSA balances. Hawley says few people took advantage of this arrangement.

Another employer was given a $500-per-employee signing bonus for signing their collective bargaining agreement. Hawley says he encouraged the employer to "dump that money" into employees' HSAs rather than adding it to their paychecks. That meant each employee received the entire $500 bonus rather than netting $300 after taxes. "It took a lot of explaining before [employees] understood that this was a much better deal for them," Hirschfield explains. "Some people didn't really understand it until they got their quarterly statement and saw that it really was their money to keep."

Plan-Design Details

In 2007, single coverage under the HDHP (dubbed Plan E) includes a $1,100 annual deductible ($2,200 for family coverage) and an annual out-of-pocket maximum of $2,500 ($5,000 for family coverage). Once the deductible is met, traditional PPO coinsurance kicks in and pays 80% of in-network health expenses until the out-of-pocket maximum is met. Once enrollees hit the maximum, the plan pays 100% of eligible expenses. After the deductible is met, the plan also pays 80% of the cost for generic drugs (70% for brand names). Prescriptions are covered at 100% (for either generics or brand names) once the out-of-pocket maximum is met. The lifetime maximum benefit under the plan is $2 million per person. The plan also offers first-dollar coverage for preventive care up to $500 per person per year. NCGTSF's other health insurance options don't cover preventive care after age six.

Under the HDHP, prescription costs plummeted from an average of $108 PEPM to just $18 PEPM. Hirschfield attributes much of the drop to increased use of generics and over-the-counter drugs. "I had calls from people that found drugs were cheaper at Costco than they were through our PBM," she says. "The awareness was enormous."

While she admits that the drop also might indicate that some employees may be forgoing needed medication, she says there hasn't been any evidence to show that enrollees are skimping on care. Tellez says HDHP enrollees seem to be buying more generic drugs and are more careful in how they use their medical resources. "We pay the bills here so we know what they are doing with these funds," she says. "This story affirms that when [employees] are given the right financial incentives, they tend to make good choices," Tellez says.

Some of the NCGTSF's larger employers have very rich benefits that offer no incentive to move to generics. What might be happening is that HDHP enrollees are taking money out of their pockets for prescriptions rather than using their HSAs because they want to use the HSA for retirement or larger expenses, Hawley speculates.

Hirschfield expects a new HSA rule that allows HDHP enrollees to contribute the full statutory amount to an HSA at any time during the year will encourage more employer members of the trust to move to an HDHP (ICDC 12/22/06, p. 1).

According to the previous rules, the annual HSA contribution was tied to the number of months a person was covered during the calendar year. Under the new law, that enrollee can make the full statutory contribution ($5,650 for single coverage) in December.

Wendy's 'Beefs Up' Preventive Care Incentives

Employees at Wendy's International have not seen their health coverage premiums increase since 2005 when the company implemented a full-replacement HSA strategy, according to Jeff Cava, the restaurant chain's executive vice president of human resources. For 2007, however, employees who don't complete a health risk assessment will be asked to pay more for their health coverage. Cava provided an overview of Wendy's health coverage — as well as its strategies to keep employees healthy — at the Health & Human Capital Management Congress, in Washington, D.C., last month.

"We have not had to raise premiums because our health care claims costs over the past two years have not increased," Cava said during a Jan. 19 presentation. "I'm proud of that and proud that people seem to be making better decisions" about their health. For 2006, Cava said, claims costs were 7% below 2005's levels, and 2005's numbers were 14% below costs incurred in 2004.

About 85% of the company's 9,000 eligible employees (20,000 lives) are enrolled in one of five high-deductible health plan (HDHP) options from UnitedHealth Group. Each option includes an HSA contribution that covers approximately 60% of the annual deductible (ICDC 3/10/06, p. 4). The plans also include 100% coverage for preventive care. The incentive seems to be paying off. In 2006, 38% of eligible employees had a physical — up from a mere 20% in 2004 when employees were enrolled in more traditional managed care plans.

Along with providing 100% first-dollar coverage for preventive care, Wendy's also encourages its older employees (age 50 or above) to have a colonoscopy. Last year, 2.5 employees per 1,000 underwent the procedure, which is free to the employee. Cava said Wendy's results are significantly higher than United's book-of-business average of 1.4 procedures per 1,000 employees.

Enrollment in the company's health plan increased from 68% of eligible employees in 2006 to 72% this year. "People are coming back because they realize this works," Cava told attendees. At the end of 2006, employees who still had funds left in an HSA had an average balance of $800 — up from $600 at the end of 2005. About 90% of the company's enrollees had HSA dollars left at the end of the year, Cava said.

Bush Proposal Would Turbocharge HSAs, but Could Boost Uninsured

President Bush's proposed standard deduction for the purchase of health insurance would "one-up" HSAs, according to Michael Cannon, director of health policy studies at the Cato Institute, a libertarian think tank based in Washington, D.C. Cannon was one of three panelists at a Cato-sponsored Feb. 2 briefing on the president's latest proposal to make health coverage more affordable.

In his Jan. 23 State of the Union address, Bush proposed a change to the tax code that would create a uniform tax deduction for health insurance — $15,000 for family coverage and $7,500 for those with single coverage.

The value of employer-funded health insurance would then be taxed the same as wages. The idea is that the deduction will prompt workers to enroll in less costly health plans because the deduction would be the same regardless of the plan's cost (ICDC 1/26/06, p. 1).

"If you want to make consumers more cost conscious, the standard tax deduction is kind of like an HSA on steroids," Cannon said. "HSAs only provide a [financial incentive] to those who open an account, but the standard deduction would provide that incentive to everyone."

Under the proposed plan, as long as the cost of health coverage is less than the standard deduction, people will see their tax bills go down, explained Katherine Baicker, Ph.D., an economic adviser at the White House. Between 20% and 25% of employer policies cost more than the standard deduction, she said.

Leonard Burman, Ph.D., a senior fellow at the Washington, D.C.-based Urban Institute, however, suggested that the plan, as proposed, would cause many people to drop employer-sponsored health coverage. Healthy employees might decide they can get less expensive health coverage on their own, he explained. That would leave it up to employers to cover the costliest employees or to drop health coverage altogether.

On the positive side, however, Burman said the proposal, if enacted, would give employees an incentive to know the value of their health coverage. That knowledge could put pressure on employers to offer more cost-effective health insurance, he said.

Burman also said HSAs should be made available to anyone with health coverage, not just coverage that meets the Treasury Dept.'s definition of an HSA-compatible plan. "Some people might want plans with high deductibles, but others might want plans that offer aggressively managed care. You should leave that to the market," he said.

Employer Contributions Prompt Enrollees to Fund HSAs, United Says

Employees are far more likely to contribute their own money to an HSA if their employer makes a contribution, according to a new study of high-deductible health plan [HDHP] enrollees. The effect employer contributions have on contribution patterns is particularly dramatic among low-income employees. While 80% of low-income employees (those earning $25,000 or less a year) added their own dollars to an HSA when their employer contributed funds, the percentage dropped to 23% when the employer didn't make a contribution, according to the study.

The study, released Jan. 30, is based on data from 25,000 individuals enrolled in employer-sponsored HDHP coverage from UnitedHealth Group during all 12 months of 2005 (the first 12-month period for which data are available). The study examined United's HDHP enrollees as well as their HSA spending and savings patterns. United's banking subsidiary, Exante Financial Services, administers more than 250,000 HSAs (about $300 million in deposits).

Rather than offer an HSA contribution, some employers would rather make the HDHP the lowest-priced option and encourage enrollees to use their premium savings to fund an HSA on their own. But that strategy might have unintended consequences, warns Meredith Baratz, vice president of market solutions in United's Definity Health division. "If part of your benefit strategy is to have people use the accounts to save for future health expenses, you might be cutting off your nose to spite your face," she says. When employers offered an HSA contribution, United says, 91% of employees opened an HSA. However, when the employer didn't contribute funds, just 45% of HDHP enrollees opened an account, the study found.

HSA Contributions Average $1,861

Here's a look at some highlights from the study:

◆ HSAs cover nearly 70% of deductible: The combined employer-employee HSA contribution averaged $1,861 in 2005, and enrollees faced an average deductible of $2,700, according to the study. Employers contributed an average of $895 that year.

◆ Full replacements prompt larger contributions: When HDHPs were offered as a full replacement, the combined employer-employee contribution averaged $2,150 in 2005 (nearly $300 more than the average). However, those enrollees also were more likely to tap the accounts to pay for health care. Full-replacement enrollees used an average of $1,221 from their HSAs in 2005, while those enrolled in an HDHP just offered as a plan option used an average of $200 less.

◆ Most enrollees carried over a balance: More than 85% of account holders had an HSA balance at the end of 2005 — the average balance was $815. Low-income enrollees, who are more likely to spend down the accounts, carried an average balance of $761 into 2006.

◆ Large employers contribute less: Employers with at least 5,000 employees contributed an average of $680 to their employees' HSAs in 2005. By contrast, small employers (fewer than 100 employees) contributed an average of $1,100.

lives came from its Definity and PacifiCare acquisitions, and the remaining 1.8 million were grown internally, says spokesperson Ian Stanton.

CIGNA Corp., which released enrollment data Feb. 7, says its account-based plans now cover 500,000 lives — double the number reported a year ago. The firm says its HRA-based plans now account for 85% of its CDH enrollment — up from 80% last year. CIGNA says 76,000 lives are now covered by an integrated HSA-based plan — up from 50,000 a year ago. As of Dec. 31, Aetna, Inc. says 627,000 lives were covered by its CDH plans — up from 406,000 at the end of 2005. Aetna released its year-end enrollment results Feb. 8.

Several midsize health plans also posted significant enrollment gains over the past year. Great-West

ICDC Celebrates 100th Issue

This is the 100th issue of Inside Consumer-Directed Care. The debut issue was published Nov. 1, 2002, just a few months after the Treasury Dept. clarified the tax treatment of health reimbursement arrangements (HRAs). That guidance set the stage for the dramatic growth of account-based health coverage over the next four-and-a-half years. In our first issue, we reported that Definity Health (now a division of UnitedHealth Group), had just 28 employer clients and 50,000 enrollees. Lumenos (now a division of WellPoint, Inc.) was the nation's second largest CDH firm at the time and had 30,000 enrollees. As of Jan. 1, United's Definity division had 1,980 HRA clients and 1.14 million enrollees. As of September 2006, WellPoint said its combined HRA and HSA enrollment was 731,000.

Healthcare says enrollment in its HRA-based plans soared more than 300% over the past year, from 4,000 lives to 12,695. Enrollment in its HSA-qualified plans jumped 260% from 9,200 lives to 23,900, the company says. Medica says the addition of “a couple large groups” over the past year helped boost enrollment in its HSA-based plans from 27,360 to more than 98,000. (Medica’s enrollment data includes administrative services only accounts.) Vested Health reports enrollment in its HRA-based plans nearly doubled, from 18,000 a year ago to 30,000 this year. Medical Mutual of Ohio says enrollment in its HSA-based plans increased from 25,000 a year ago to 60,000 this year.

A few health plans, however, experienced enrollment declines. Bluegrass Family Health, for example, says enrollment in its HRA plans decreased about 5% during the past year, but enrollment in its HSA-qualified plans grew by 48%.

Mutual of Omaha reported a significant enrollment drop in its HSA-based plans after it lost a large client. The insurer says 1,883 lives are now covered by its HSA-based plans. Principal also lost two substantial accounts, which it says caused a large decrease in its HRA-based enrollment. But Principal also saw a substantial increase in its HSA-qualified plans. ✧

◆ The National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association (NARFE) says it is concerned about President Bush’s plan to expand the number of HSA-based plans available through the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program (FEHBP). Under that proposal — part of the president’s fiscal year 2008 budget presented Feb. 5 — Blue Cross and Blue Shield plans would be allowed to offer HSA-based plans to federal employees. Several other health plans, including Aetna, Inc. and Coventry Health Care, Inc., have offered

HSA-based coverage through FEHBP since Jan. 1, 2005. The nation’s Blues plans provide health benefits to more federal employees than does any other carrier. In a prepared statement, NARFE said it was concerned that the Bush administration wants to use FEHBP to “jump start HSAs” among federal workers. A similar proposal also was included in Bush’s fiscal 2007 budget (ICDC 3/24/06, p. 5). Visit NARFE at www.narfe.org.
